Apartment Demand Cools After Sharp Increase in Rents

American renters are finding fewer apartments as demand in the third quarter fell to its lowest level in 13 years, after a long stretch of record-high rents.

Some renters are choosing to make roommates, with others are leaving with family or friends. More people are opting to stay longer in their parents' homes or moving back in, rather than pay steep market increases, according to a recent U.S. survey.

Apartment demand in the quarter, measured by the one-year change in the occupancy of units, was the lowest since 2009, when the U.S. was feeling the effects of the subprime crisis, according to recent surveys.
